Seton Hall University's journal of undergraduate research

Overview The College of Arts and Sciences of Seton Hall University supports undergraduate research in all disciplines and continues its initiative to disseminate students' scholarly work in journal form. Student editors and contributors, with start-up support from faculty advisors from three principal academic areas, collaborate towards producing an annual publication that presents rigorous undergraduate research.

New call for submissions Scholarly works written by undergraduate students of Seton Hall University are invited; work completed up to two years prior to the Fall 2020 publication date are accepted. We encourage a writing style that, while erudite and conversant with the author's specific area of research, is also accessible to non-specialists. While not required, works that draw from theories, methods, practices and perspectives of two or more disciplines written in an accessible manner are encouraged. Manuscripts will be peer reviewed by undergraduate student editors of the College of Arts and Sciences who represent the Humanities, Sciences and Mathematics, and Social Sciences. However, contributions from student authors from all Seton Hall colleges and academic units are welcome. New submission deadline 15 May 2020

Inquiries Editorial inquiries may be directed by prospective authors to the relevant faculty advisor or student editor (by major or by the proposed publication's discipline).
